Greetings Alpha Kappa Psi,

Hello my name is Siham Abdallah, I am a sophomore pursuing my major in public health and my minor is in biology. I don't have a single word to describe me as a person, I would say my actions and my dedication to what I pursue is what makes me the person I am. I like to research history in my free time because of the endless questions I gain throughout my research. My latest hobby has been researching Ancient Egypt which has led me to where I truly receive my inspiration from. Reading about archaeologists and researchers constantly finding out new facts by putting in hard dedication to read unknown scriptures or spend years studying wall markings. I would say figures who take whatever measures necessary to find what they are looking for is what inspires me as a person. Which reflects off my character of always searching for answers to my questions. Which is a skill that has helped me tremendously in the real world especially when it comes to public health and the course work of constantly searching for answers through data and statistics.

While my major isn't business, I've learned that public health, and business intersect more than people realize. Through my public health coursework, I've learned how to analyze data trends, and evaluate how decisions affect entire populations, skills that directly translate into a business environment. I've gained hands-on experience in both healthcare and sales, which has shaped my professional skills. As a physical therapy assistant, I worked closely with patients and healthcare providers in fast-paced settings. In my role as a sales associate, I learned how to adapt to different personalities, manage multiple responsibilities, and contribute to team goals in a results driven environment. That experience gave me firsthand insight into how businesses operate day-to-day which also strengthened my ability to adapt quickly and contribute to team goals. As well as being a club event organizer for the Interact Club which focused on supporting real world issues in any way we could, while also learning about the dedication it takes in the management process. These experiences align closely with AKPsi's mission of developing principled leaders across different career paths.

I am particularly interested in AKPsi because I have realized that while resumes matter, interviews are often the make-or-break factor in securing opportunities. As I said mentioned dedication is what inspires me so, rather than joining another public health organization where I am already gaining technical knowledge, I would like to be a part of AKPsi to gain a different perspective and develop business professional skills while also using my public health background to contribute a people-centered perspective that complements AKPsi's business focused mission.

I would be thrilled to be given the chance of an interview to forecast my skills to Alpha Kappa Psi. In order to hopefully gain a chance to grow within this fraternity and offer my contribution where it is needed.
