Dear Alpha Kappa Psi,

I wouldn't be the person I am without running. Running has taught me how to handle the vulnerability that comes with effort. On race day you put it all out there for everyone to see. There's no hiding. When you succeed there's no issue. No one wants to hide from their triumphs. But life isn't a straight line to the top. I've had to face myself when I know I did everything and it still wasn't enough. The next day though I was running again. This is how I approach my life largely. You put yourself out there for everyone to see. You don't shy away from a challenge and regardless of the outcome the next day you're back out there again. AKPSI is another thing I don't want to shy away from.

The last few years of my life I've had to transition from a kid who was looking up to the seniors in high school to being the person that new kids have to look up to. During high school I was a member of Colt Squad where we spoke to all the schools in the district about building positive habits at an early age. I don't know if they were really listening, but I will always remember how excited they were when we came in to see them. That's what really led me into mentoring. It's why I started volunteering once a month at elementary schools my last two years and taking kids on my cross-country team under my wing.

When I was in high school I had almost exclusively AP classes. What comes with that is you're around ambitious people who are striving for academic success and what underlies that is a greater sense that you need to fulfill your potential. My first semester here at Wayne I felt that shift where not everyone has the same perspective towards school. They view it as a ticket to their next destination, while I view it as a place for you to cultivate who you truly want to be. AKPsi is a community that I believe will support that. The chance for me to learn from the current brothers and be able to give back to the future members of AKPsi would be an honor I would never take for granted.

Regardless of the final decision I am already grateful for the impact the last week has had on me. I met some people that I truly believe I can call friends and I am so excited to grow further with them whether it's through AKPsi or outside of it. If you choose to invite me for an interview and you were to eventually welcome me into AKPsi, then I want you to know that I will give my all to this brotherhood.

Sincerely,

James Latstetter
